AIS	501	American Indian Studies Paradigms	American Indian Studies emerged as an academic discipline in the late 1960s in part because of increasing dissatisfaction among Indians about the works of historians, anthropologists, and other scholars that was very often marred by methodological and conceptual flaws. Course provides an overview of ways of "doing" Indian studies from an American Indian Studies paradigm(s) through a critical examination of some of the most significant works emanating from this growing body of literature. Critiques paradigms that selected scholars have employed in the researching and writing of their topics. Seminar format allows students to take the lead in discussing each week's readings. Covers a range of scholarship dealing with American Indian issues; explores the development of American Indian Studies as an academic discipline; probes paradigms that Indigenous scholars have developed; and considers how those paradigms differ from those used by other disciplines. AIS	512	Historical Trauma, Healing, and Decolonization	In recent years, scholars have begun to explore the prevalence of historical trauma among American Indian communities. This research argues that the genocide, violence, breakdown of customary cultures through external coercion; and oppression that Indians continue to face at the hands of foreign colonizers has left Indians with harmed with intergenerational self-destructive behavior, domestic violence, suicide, anxiety, depression, low self-esteem, and anger. As a result of this violence and oppression, they have developed models of recovering healthy nations while challenging violations of their human rights in the domestic and international arenas. This history has given rise to a widespread cultural revitalization movement often referred to as decolonization. Scholars from an array of academic disciplines are producing a growing body of literature about decolonization.	N	SEM	N	GNA	Liberal Arts and Sciences	American Indian Studies Program	3. Course explores these issues and dynamics and challenges the student to examine the unique identity and contributions of urban Indians. Students learn the history of Indigenous migrations to the city and assess current needs and concerns through consultation work coordinated with Phoenix area Indian Centers and nonprofit organizations. AIS	515	The Work and Legacy of Vine Deloria, Jr	Vine Deloria, Jr, Standing Rock Sioux (1933-2005) has often been referred to as "Uncle Vine" for his role in the intellectual development of innumerable scholars, as well as legal and political figures, all of whom have striven along side Deloria at making the world a better and more just place for indigenous communities. As such, Deloria has also been labeled "the Dean of American Indian Studies" because of his work at shaping the intellectual and political agenda, which began in 1969 with the seminal publication of Custer Died for Your Sins: An Indian Manifesto and continued posthumously with works on the medicine man traditions throughout North America and a reflection on Carl Gustav Jung's analyses of American Indian customs and beliefs. This seminar, the first of its kind, takes a comprehensive look at Deloria's philosophical and legalistic legacy by examining his major works and analyzing, in addition to critiquing, the ideas and opinions that shaped his intellectual career.
