CHARLES TRUMBULL HAYDEN (1825-1900) was born in Connecticut. He founded a trading and freighting firm in Tucson in 1858, five years before the Territory of Arizona was established. In 1871, he built the first home and flour mill in what is now Tempe.

He maintained a life-long interest in books and education. Mr. Hayden was one of those whose efforts led to the establishment of the Arizona Territorial Normal School at Tempe. He was appointed the first president of the Normal School Board by Gov. F. A. Tritle in 1885.

Arizona State University takes pride in naming this building in memory of Charles Trumbull Hayden — pioneer, educator, businessman and builder.

University Librarian

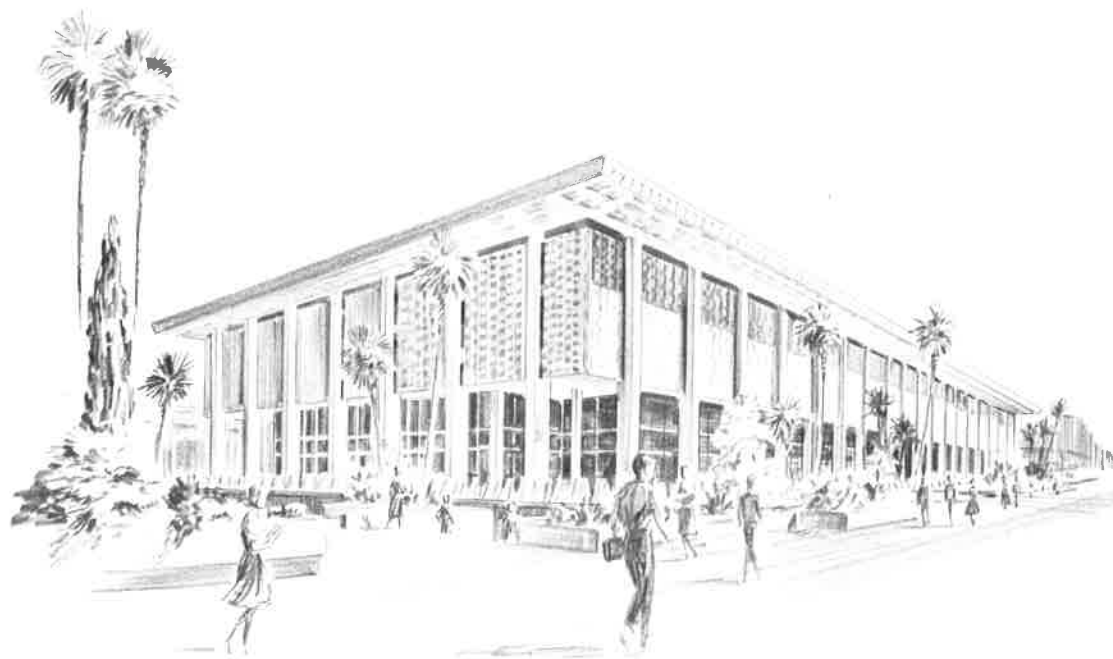

Alan D. Covey, Arizona State University librarian since 1962, was graduated from the University of California at Berkeley and holds a doctorate from Stanford University. He has had library administration experience at both of those universities, as well as at San Francisco and Sacramento State Colleges. He supervised the building programs of three major libraries, and has served as consultant on several other library buildings.

Norman H. Strouse

Norman H. Strouse, chairman of the board and chief executive officer of J. Walter Thompson Company, world's largest advertising agency, one of the leading exponents of the importance of books and libraries. He maintains an important assemblage of rare books and manuscripts, including special collections of the works of Thomas Carlyle and Robert Louis Stevenson.

An enthusiastic participant in library work, he is a trustee of the New York Public Library, a council member of The Grolier Club and of the Friends of Columbia Libraries.

Architects

Weaver and Drover, architects for the library building and adjacent mall, in consultation with Dr. Covey, designed an extremely flexible building, capable of expanding with the university's and the library's needs. The building contains 205,000 square feet of enclosed space, and is constructed on a modular basis with few permanent walls and provision for two additional levels.

Established in 1950, Weaver and Drover has received many national and regional awards for achievement in design. The Charles Trumbull Hayden Library earned an Award of Merit for library construction from the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in collaboration with the American Institute of Architects and the Educational Facilities Laboratories, Inc.

General Contractors

Originating in New York, TGK Construction Company has become well known since coming to Arizona in 1950. The firm has many educational and industrial plants to its credit, including Motorola's 52nd Street at McDowell and Mesa plants, General Electric and Sperry Phoenix buildings, the East High School, and additions at Phoenix Union.

Supervising the Hayden Library construction were Lloyd Knochenhauer, vice president and general superintendent, and James Hyde, building superintendent.

History Of Arizona State University Libraries

The history of library development at Arizona State University reflects the growth of the institution not only in numbers of students but also in the enlargements of its educational mission.

The library began in 1891 with an encyclopedia and some $200 worth of books, serving an enrollment of 55 prospective teachers. Makeshift arrangements were utilized until 1929 when work began on Matthews Library. In September, 1930, library resources had grown to 18,350 volumes for a student body of 523. Library facilities proved inadequate by 1935 and, during that year, the second half of the building was added as the enrollment reached 1,047 students and the number of volumes 21,135.

At the end of World War II, a second major stage in the growth of the institution began. Not only was there an unprecedented increase in the number of students but also a significant addition to the educational objective. Instruction in the liberal arts and the professions, as well as education, assumed importance. New resources were required which, together with the continuing increase in enrollment, necessitated the expansion of Matthews Library in 1950-51 and again in 1960-61.

In 1961, a still more consequential enlargement of the educational program occurred. The Regents established doctoral programs outside the field of education, signifying that Arizona State University had assumed the responsibility of offering full programs of graduate and professional training. At the same time, studies clearly indicated the extraordinary increase in numbers of students was to continue. Projections indicated a potential of 30,000 students by 1972-73.

Consequently, in the fall term of 1961, President Durham appointed a faculty committee to investigate and make recommendations concerning the development of library facilities required by the greatly expanded educational mission of the institution.

The members of the Library Study Planning Committee were: Executive Vice President William J. Burke, Academic Vice President H. D. Richardson, University Librarian Alan D. Covey, and Professors Douglas G. Arner (Chairman), Robert W. Ashe, Keith Davis, Ben R. Gossick, John H. Krenkel, J. J. Lamberts, Evar D. Nering, Truet B. Thompson and Harry B. Whitehurst.

The Charles Trumbull Hayden Library, now completed as a result of this planning, makes available extensive research and study facilities to University students and faculty. Seating is available for 2,946 readers. The building's levels are subject-oriented, with 27 miles of open stacks, currently housing 600,000 items, with a capacity for 1,300,000 volumes.
